Introduction

Family is the main social link of any society. Family values and family stability are also important in Uzbekistan. But in recent years, processes related to the increase in the number of rulings have been observed in the republic. The increase in marriage and divorce rates indicates the presence of deep social problems in this area. This article analyzes the main reasons for marriages and divorces and their indicators.

Indicators of marriage and divorce

In recent years, changes in marriage and divorce rates have been observed in Uzbekistan. According to the statistics of 2024, the number of divorces will be 7.47, and the number of marriages will be 11.5, which is a higher indicator compared to previous years. These numbers show that there are problems related to the stability of the family.

The main reasons for divorce

1. Economic factors

One of the main causes of divorce is economic factors. Family insecurity, housing problems, and lack of income lead to an increase in divorce. Many young families face economic difficulties, which negatively affects their family relationships. When housing is a problem and family income is insufficient, disagreements escalate and lead to divorce.

2. Personal and psychological problems

Another common reason for divorce is personal and psychological problems. Mutual misunderstanding, emotional pressure, lack of experience and lack of psychological adjustment among young people lead to decisions. Family problems are often exacerbated by a lack of communication and problem-solving skills.

3. Changing values in society

In Uzbekistan, the weakening of family values in society is the reason for the increase of divorces. A decline in traditional family values, such as cooperation, patience, and mutual respect, undermines family stability among young people. As a result, family problems increase and lead to an increase in the number of divorces.

Breakdown statistics and trends

Divorces in most cases occur during the first five years of marriage. According to the State Statistics Committee, the number of decisions in 2022 increased by 10% compared to 2020. This indicator shows that it is related to disagreements and financial difficulties between young families. Most of the divorces are observed in young families who do not have economic stability.

This chart depicts the number of registered marriages in Uzbekistan from 2015 to the first half of 2024 (January to June), with the unit in thousands.

Conclusions and recommendations

In order to prevent family divorces, it is necessary to strengthen social and economic support programs, prepare young people for family responsibilities, and widely promote family values. It is important to expand government housing and economic assistance programs to ensure family stability. It is also necessary to introduce marriage preparation programs and develop psychological support services.
